RECORDS' CONTEXT

Name of creators: Wick Harbour Trust

Administrative history: Wick Harbour is strategically situated on the northeast tip of mainland Scotland at 58° 26.5' N, and 003° 04' W, and has provided a safe haven for fishing, commercial, and leisure vessels for hundreds of years.

Although Wick had been a port, the seat of a sheriff court and a royal burgh for hundreds of years, it was the British Fisheries Society development of a harbour on the south side of Wick Bay in the early nineteenth century that transformed Wick from 'a place of little account' to the largest herring fishing port in Europe.

Wick's long association with the herring fishing industry began way back in 1767, when three local men, Alexander Miller of Staxigoe, John Sutherland of Wester and John Anderson of Wick outfitted two sloops and began to fish for herring. The British government had begun to pay bounties on boats and the fish they caught. After initial setbacks, they persevered and Miller at least became very wealthy. These three pioneers of the herring trade in Wick set an example that was followed by locals who started to fish from inlets along the coast from Wick north to Staxigoe.

The 1790s saw the British Fisheries Society investigate the prospect of building a harbour and fishing village on the opposite bank of the river to Wick, as part of wider plans to promote the fishing industry in the Highlands. The Society was keen to develop a fishing port on the east coast, as there was not a safe harbour between the Cromarty and Pentland Firths "whence a vessel in distress can take shelter."

Land was acquired from Sir Benjamin Dunbar in 1803 and the earliest harbour works began. Renowned architect and civil engineer Thomas Telford was commissioned to build the harbour and associated village, complete with yards and stores for the industry.

Alongside Thomas Telford, Thomas Stevenson, father of Robert Louis, who lived in Harbour Terrace, and local man James Bremner, whose distinctive "Round House" overlooks the Inner Basin, and whose memorial stands above the Old Lifeboat shed, were also eminent civil engineers who contributed to the harbour.

From 1879 the port was owned and operated by Wick Harbour Trust, a publicly constituted body whose members were elected from local fishing, business and council interests. Trade at Wick peaked around 1900 when some 1,120 vessels were based at the harbour.

On 1 Jul 2005, management of the port changed from Wick Harbour Trust to the new Wick Harbour Authority. The later 20th century saw a decline in traditional fishing but commercial trade continued to thrive into the 21st century, with regular deliveries of fuel, oil, agricultural lime, road salt, coal, oil related cargo and wind turbines. Exports include local high quality barley for malting, and timber.

A new Marina facility was opened in 2009. Development of wave, tidal, offshore wind, and oil exploration in the Pentland and Moray Firths also increased at this time.

The Harbour as of 2023 consists of three basins: - the Inner and Outer Harbours are the main fishing and leisure berths, and the River Harbour is the commercial area.

Notes:

A note on naming conventions:

The records concerning the harbour date from 1829-1990. In this time the name(s) given to the harbour or harbours in Wick Bay has changed. This is reflected in the titles given to the harbour(s) within the records which include; 'Pulteneytown Harbour', 'Pulteney Harbour', 'Wick and Pulteneytown Harbour(s)', 'Wick and Pulteney Harbour(s)' and finally 'Wick Harbour'.

These names do not change consistently across different record groups and are used interchangeably within many of the records.

The exact name found within each record has been used in its description.
